THE FISHERMAN'S SUMMONS.

The sea is calling, calling.
 Wife, is there a log to spare?
 Flung it down on the deck and then in,
 "The boys and girls with their merry din,
 I am left to leave you all just yet,
 In the light and the noise I might forget,
 The voice of the evening air."
 The sea is calling, calling.
 Along the harbor shore,
 I know each nook in the rocky strand,
 And the crimson weeds on the golden sand,
 And the worn old shell where the pinkie cling,
 And the winding curves where the seahorse ring,
 I shall wait there never more.
 How it keeps calling, calling!
 It is never a night to sleep.
 I say the "sea" over the height,
 As far as the eye can reach my falling sight,
 And the cottage corners and rocks, well high,
 As the old "Fox" did in the days gone by,
 In the mean of this rising tide.
 Yet it is calling, calling!
 It is hard on a soul to say
 To go butting in the cold and the dark:
 Like the bird that tells us, from the ark,
 While the foam flies thick on the bitter salt,
 And the angry waves roll fierce and fast,
 Where the black buoy marks the bay.
 Do you hear it calling, calling?
 And yet, I am not alone,
 At the harbor's edge, but I am not
 No boat but mine for tackle and gear,
 And I started the cobbles pace the rest,
 When the head, but about like a withered leaf,
 And the wind whistled in my ears.
 Will it never stop calling, calling?
 Can't you sing a song by the hearth,
 A heartsome strain of a merry tune,
 Or a gallant fight, or a bonnie life,
 Or a love story, or a tale just as you wish,
 Come over then, give me a hand to touch,
 Still warm with the warmth of earth.
 You hear it calling, calling?
 Ask why I am here and there,
 She always did when the sea was up,
 The would have been the first to cry up
 When I and the lads were out at night,
 And she saw the breakers creating white
 Beneath the low black skies.
 But, then, in the calling, calling,
 No answer to call me out,
 Now—well, fetch the paven, find the boat,
 It is up on the shelf there if you look,
 The sea has been friend, and fire, and bread,
 Put me, where it will tell of us, lying dead,
 How it called, and I have come and went.
 —All the Year Round—

THE DOOM OF BUCKINGHAM.

"The Doom of Buckingham," the heading of one of Sir Bernard Burke's sermons, is well justified by the fatality which seems to haunt the possessors of the dukedom. It was first bestowed on Humphrey de Stafford, who, with his eldest son, fell in the wars of the Roses. His second son and successor in the title was the friend and victim of Richard III. in whose reign Robert Grey, the famous lion which made the fortune of more than one provincial actor. The sad story of the third duke may also be read in Shakespeare. He had imprudently defied Wolsey, who found no difficulty in tramping up a charge of treason, upon which the duke was found guilty by his peers and beheaded on Tower Hill. When the Emperor Charles V. heard of his execution, he is reported to have exclaimed, "A butcher's dog has killed the first duke in England." The dual title, because extinct by his attainder, and the revival of the dukedom, proved only a transitory gleam, for the male line expired towards the middle of the seventeenth century with Roger Manners, who died without issue, leaving his dukedom to the name of Rutland or Rutland. His sister married a joiner, and was the mother of the Newport collier already mentioned as entitled to quarter the royal arms. The first Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, fell by the knife of Feltton. The death-bed of the second has been immortalized by Pope, and the moral lesson was taken by the assurance that instead of—"In the worst in the worst room, with a black-bug, the walls of plaster, and the floor of dirt," we should read, "in a well-furnished apartment of his steward's house," Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, so created in 1703, reflected quite as much lustre on the title as he derived from it; but his race ended with his son who died of consumption at 18, before attaining his majority.—Biographical and Critical Essays.

THE MAD HARPOONER.

"We sailed out of Rio in as good a trim as ever yet a ship sailed, with twenty good men in the fore, a noble clipper and good pay, and first-class owners. I thought myself lucky to get a berth in the 'Wild Rover,' one of the best craft in the sperm fishery. We had run into Rio to land one of the owners, who had some South American speculation on his hands, and here we shipped two more men, one of them a harpooner. He was a strange fellow, six feet high, with cords and sinews that beat anything I ever saw. A grand-built man, with a broad face, and eyes that seemed to burn into your soul when you looked at him.
 "He outwitted me from the first. A man must chum with somebody on board ship, and he took to me. I found that while he was a silent seaman to all the rest, he would unbend to me; and many a long, easy talk we had in the tops and on the long swell of the Southern Pacific. He called himself Wild Rover. Why he chose that name I don't know; but it wasn't his right name, and no one knew exactly what it was, or over what it was. He used to say to me sometimes that it would be better for him, better for others, if he were down among the coral."
 "I'll go there some day, Ben," he said; "and when you see the last of Wild Rover, you will know that the waves have closed over a heart weary of the troubles and crosses of this world. Do you know why I make a good harpooner? Because I seek death; because it would be to me a happy release from a life of pain. I'm afraid to live."
 "Afraid to live!" I said.
 "That's just it, Ben. I tell you that I ain't laid upon earth. Here at sea I am better because I can sink my harpoon to the socket in a whale and think it is the heart of a man who made me what I am. There isn't a sea to talk of it, or I shall go wild. His eye began to take on the hard glare I had seen in it sometimes, and I was almost afraid of him. Just then Bob Dasher slid down a stay, and happened to light on Wild Rover's foot. He gave a howl like a wild beast, and caught Bob—he was a light man, anyhow—and flung him above his head like a football. A moment more and he would have thrown him far out into the sea, but I caught him by the arm.
 "Great heavens, Wild, what are you going to do? He looked startled, and let go his hold, and Bob Dasher dropped into the top, half scared to death. Wild looked down at him in a strange way, half sorry, and half mad.
 "Let him go away, then," he said, smiling.
 "I told you I wasn't safe, Ben, and you ought to know it."
 "Bob slid down a back stay and got to the deck; for he had no taste for such company. Wild Rover sank down in the top, and covered his face with his hands.
 "I wish you knew how to run for me, Ben," he said. "I haven't prayed since—but I won't talk of it. I wish we could get among the whales! I'm happier there than anywhere else. But remember this: when I am in my maddest moods, if you only put your hand on me, I shall change my purpose."
 "We got among the whales at last, and a welcome, sooner than Wild Rover when the look-out cried."
